Alden Smith
has new optical
Machine

Coming as a boon to the optical industry and especially to the millions of U. S. citizens who wear eye glasses in a new method of mounting rimless glasses to the frame without the use of screws. A patented instrument with which the process is applied was recently purchased by Dr. Alden Smith, optometrist, of Howard's Jewelers, 1508 Cabrillo.

"This innovation in optometry, called "Loxit" by its manufacturers, explained Dr. Smith, "was designed to take the strain from the glass where the latter is attached to the frame. Heretofore, better than 50% of all breakage in rimless glasses was due to excessive pressure on the glass. This pressure was necessary to hold the frames securely, and any slight jar or extraordinary strain would break the glass, usually at the screw hole.

Like Rivets

"The new method of attaching the frame to the glass is very similar to the manner in which rivets are used to hold steel plates together. Instead of a screw we use a small length of metal that is inserted into the frame holes and then thru the glass. This is then placed in the special instrument and with the use of electricity, the metal is heated and the ends fused over and around the frame holes. This seals the glass to the frame with just the correct amount of pressure, and at no time is there excessive strain around the contact point of the frame and glass."

Increases Sales

Dr. Smith predicts that the new method will give great impetus to sales of rimless glasses, which, though they have been popular for some time, have been limited to those who could afford repeated replacements. Under the new system, Dr. Smith states that all breakage due to strain is eliminated.
