Four Level Freeway Handling Big Load

More than 200,000 automobiles a day are using the giam four-level freeway structure which opened for full operation Tuesday, Sept. 22, the Automobile Club of Southern California said this week.

Complete operation of the $1,500,000 interchange, located just southeast of the intersection of Sunset and Figueroa Sts., will be achieved when the Harbor Freeway, from the Fifth St. northbound on-ramp to the Arroyo Seco Parkway near College St. is opened to northbound traffic on that date.

Opening of the entire interchange, the first of its kind built, will introduce a new method of handling exchange traffic between freeways.

It is greatly simplified over the conventional types of interchange systems, such as the cloverleaf, in which the left turn is accomplished by means of turning through three right angles.

Other types of interchange systems employ reversing curvature and circuitous travel for some of the traffic movements, together with numerous bridge structures, all of which are detrimental to smooth and economical operation.

The four-level traffic interchange system eliminates these objectionable features by providing a simple turn for all traffic movements in the direction each motorist desires to go.

It is done without excess distance, and the take-off from one freeway and junction with another freeway is in all cases made on the right side of the freeways, advises the Los Angeles office of the State Division of Highways.

The Hollywood Freeway is on the top or fourth level, the Harbor-Arroyo Seco Freeway on the second level. Two pairs of interchange roadways occupy the lowest level and the third level.

In this manner all the necessary traffic movements are adequately provided for with a minimum amount of turning movements.

The following advice on how to drive the new four-level structure is given by the Automobile Club.

Although the structure has been designed by engineers to make driving as simple as possible, it should be driven at reduced speeds and with extreme alertness.

The "hub" is like a giant intersection where left turns can be made freely without encountering oncoming traffic.

Large, readable, illuminated signs have been posted throughout the interchange to guide traffic.

The interchange is so designed that a motorist has to make only one decision at a time.

First, a motorist must decide whether to continue on the same freeway or transfer to another. If he wishes to stay on the same route he should remain in one of the inside lanes on the left.

If he decides to change freeways at the structure he has to leave from the deceleration lane at the right side of the freeway.

It is important to know in advance where to turn off in order to move gradually into the right-hand lane preparatory to leaving a freeway via the deceleration lane. This rule applies to any freeway driving.

Decision No. 2 comes when the motorist has entered the off-ramp. Here he must decide whether to turn to the right or to the left. Right turns must be made from the right side of the off-ramp and left turns from the left side.

While moving through the interchange, and also when entering a freeway, the motorist will meet merging traffic going in the same direction, but moving from out of another lane.

In either case, the motorist should drive at a speed equal to that of the traffic with which he is merging.
