Echo's Vehicle May Orbit Earth Until Year 6000

The third stage of the Thor Delta vehicle which propelled Echo communications sphere into space probably will still be whirling around the earth more than 4000 years from today.

Missile and space systems scientists of the Douglas Aircraft Co. predicted the third-stage casing potentially has the longest life expectancy of any object yet placed into orbit about the earth by the United States or Russia.

Longest life previously estimated for an earth satellite was the aproximate 200-plus years for the Vanguard I payload and upper stage.

* * *

THE BURNED-OUT Delta third-stage is tumbling through space in a virtual circular orbit having an apogee of 1030 miles and perigee of 954 miles. It circles the earth every 117 minutes.

Douglas scientists attributed the long orbital life of the vehicle to its high mean altitude and to the precision of its circular orbit.

These two elements serve to minimize the "drag" that will force the satellite into the atmosphere and a fiery death about the year 6000 A.D.

BUILT by Douglas for National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Delta blasted the 10 story Echo into space last Aug. 12.The vehicle third-stage, tumbled by small rockets to prevent collision with the sphere after separation, went into an orbit closely paralleling that of the huge Echo.

Douglas engineers said the third stage is 5 feet in height, 2 feet in diameter and weighs 80 pounds with its supply of solid-fuel depleted.
