MORTUARY

recommendation favoring the new mortuary was the result of lengthy and thorough consideration and deliberations.

Arguments

Isen's main contention was that 1) mortuaries in a business district have a depressing "psychological" effect; 2) Cravens is an important business street and that even Stone and Myers gives one the shudders; 3) he would rather see a separate location set up for mortuaries; 4) these "beautiful, quiet buildings" will make Cravens into a Dead End street.

Interested parties on both sides spoke on the matter from the floor. It was pointed out that 1) Torrance has no other mortuary facilities at present except one; 2) that the city has no special Mortuary Row and could not possibly create such a restricted area; 3) the new mortuary would not provide a parking problem; and 4 related businesses should be kept together.

City Manager George Stevens later in the evening indicated that planning can never be so perfect that one can avoid granting of variances. Los Angeles does not have a special area for mortuaries either, Stevens said.
