Mystery of Growing Old Challenges Researchers

Until recently the problem of aging has been like Mark Twain's description of the weather: "Everyone talks about it but no one does anything about it." Now there is growing interest in gerontology, the scientific study of the aging process. Out of this research is coming some new information and much conjecture.

There is agreement that aging and eventual death is normal in all living things. From studying the chemistry of living cells, biochemists have determined that there are two sets of factors which contribute to aging. These are intrinsic factors, based on the way our body cells are constructed, and extrinsic factors in the environment in which we live.

It has been estimated that normal life span ought to be 100 to 120 years. This limit is imposed, according to one theory, by the chemical structure of deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA), an extremely complex substance containing the code which tells each of our cells how to function. With the passage of time, changes in the DNA make it send faulty information to the cell with resulting degeneration and death.

* * *

SOME OF OUR tissues continue to grow throughout life, so that when one cell dies another is available to take its place. But other parts of the body, such as the brain, contain their maximum number of cells at birth and the loss of cells which occurs with aging is irreplaceable. As cells are lost, so is the work they performed.

A structure like the brain contains countless millions of cells, many of which can die without any noticeable change in the function of the whole. Eventually, though, enough cells are lost to produce the well known mental changes associated with aging.

* * *

THERE APPEARS to be little that science can do to extend the pre-determined chemical life span of our cells. But some of the extrinsic factors of aging may be possible to control. Frequency of child bearing, amount of sleep, diet, exercise, use of tobacco, alcohol and drugs, and exposure to chemicals and radiation have all been suggested as possible contributing factors to the shortening of life span. Some of these act directly on the cells. Others, such as improper diet, have their effect on the cells indirectly.

For example, there is evidence to show that atherosclerosis (gradual narrowing of the arteries) can be influenced by an overabundance of certain types of fat in our food. As the arteries become constricted by this process, the amount of oxygen they are capable of delivering to the cells becomes reduced. So, fat in the diet may kill cells indirectly by slowly choking off their oxygen supply.

It is not the object of gerontologists to enable men to live forever, nor do many think this can or should be accomplished. But, as scientists, they are trying to determine just what it is that causesaging. Their work may lead to methods of preventing certain critical structures such as the heart and brain from aging prematurely.
