ON PLANTING DAY it rained and the nursery people had to store the plants elsewhere for a time. Three days later John planted his vines and watered them properly. But the vines didn't grow, Before long most of them died. He replanted new vines which lived.

Farmer John sued the nursery for his added costs and the crop loss. He claimed that it had warranted the plant to be in growing condition when he bought them.

Plans for New Drain

It is always a big let down when you plant a shrub or tree and nurse it along only to have it die later. It is far worse, when your business is farming. Take farmer John, for instance.

John bought 50,000 boysenberry vines from Smith's nursery. Not all places are suitable for berries, and their planting had to be done at a special time. Farmer John took all the suggested precautions. Because the order was big, the nursery, as usual, dug up and put the vines in cold storage until they were ready for planting.
