Oil and Water Don't Mix, But Tulsa, Needing Water, Paid $7,500,000 For It

By Central Press

TULSA, Okla.—Oil and water don't mix, but this oil city had to have water and plenty of it. It got it, despite politicians, despite enormous engineering difficulties, despite scores of lesser obstacles. After waiting seven years Tulsa is celebrating the completion of a $7,500,000 water supply system, one of the best in the world.

The huge dam at the source of Tulsa's water supply system, 55 miles from the city. It is 3500 feet long. In the distance is the town of Spavinaw, which had to be moved in its entirety to make room for the dam.

From a huge artificial lake in the heart of the Cherokee hills, one of the wildest regions in Oklahoma, Spavinaw river water, the source of which is high up in the great Ozark divide, flows 55 miles by gravity across eastern Oklahoma to the city. The 60-inch concrete conduit lies under three rivers, across deep gorges, through solid rock and over gentle rolling prairies.

Site Found by Accident

Ever since this city got its first boom-town impulse, the greasy, murky, red-green, loaming, salt-laden Arkansas river has been the sea and only source of water supply. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent fighting the silt and volcanic ash palmed off upon Tulsa by this outcast of rivers.

Never was this water really fit to drink; actually it was barely fit to wash in. Experts from all over the country were called in to no avail, for in summer there were days at a stretch when there was no water at all—when the mud content was so thick the water could not be forced through the filters. Tulsa has literally lived by the bottle all its life until now.

Back in 1917 a little coterie of Tulsa business men organized a hunting and fishing club. They equipped an automobile and sent three members on a scouting expedition, the object being to find a location for a clubhouse. The three scouts drove as far into the Cherokee hills as they could force their machine and, leaving it on the banks of the Spavinaw, plunged upstream through the wilderness afresh.

An Engineering Feat

A week later they returned to Tulsa with their report, which incidentally recommended a clubhouse site, but mostly saw, in the praise of a possible dam site on the Spavinaw as a future source of Tulsa's water supply. This little circle of men preached their gospel of Spavinaw water for two years without avail. Then the city administration took an interest. An election was called and bonds to the amount of $5,000,000 were voted for the Spavinaw project.

This was in the summer of 1919. Private interests, which had been attempting to sell another source of water to Tulsa, stepped in and took the Spavinaw election to court. After the usual delays the election was held illegal on a technicality and thrown out. Two years later another election was held. The Spavinaw bonds carried overwhelmingly, and subsequently, on October 11, 1922, contracts for the work were awarded. On the 14th day of last month, slightly more than two years elapsed time, the last joint of concrete pipe was poured and the major project of the system was completed.

By engineers the Spavinaw project is regarded as an unusual piece of work, due to the fact that they were compelled to run 250 miles of survey before finding the "line" which would give them the maximum incline for the gravity flow, without which the project would have been impossible because of prohibitive cost. On the "line" finally chosen there is a bare 91 feet of drop between the dam at Spavinaw and the large reservoir near Tulsa.

Third in America

Engineers rank the Spavinaw project as the third in size of its kind in America, Los Angeles and San Francisco, now constructing a new supply system, being the only municipalities that have gone a greater distance for their water than has Tulsa.

To construct the lake at Spavinaw a dam 55 feet high and 3500 feet in length was built, which backs up in the lake, 55 feet at its deepest point, 20,000,000 gallons of water, covering 1300 acres.

Two young women, evidently strangers to each other, were seated at the same table in a popular restaurant. One of them had finished her lunch; the other was about to begin.

The girl who had finished sat back in her chair and lit a cigarette.

The other seemed to resent this and said: "I suppose you do not object to my eating while you are smoking?"

The first girl looked at her and answered brightly: "Well, no, not so long as I can hear the orchestra."
