HOT WATER

There is hardly a single "transaction" in the business of the home that does not demand hot water. For an efficient, comfortable home, hot water should be ever-ready abundant.

You can have hot water in your home ... any time ... at a cost of only a few pennies a day. The new automatic natural gas water heaters are as economical as they are convenient. Natural gas is, of course, the cheapest fuel for water heating.

Look for the Blue Star Scal of the American Gas Association Testing Laboratory when you buy a new automatic natural gaf water beater from your plumber, dealer, or gas comp

EAST WANTS GOLD

If gold is hard to get and silver is easy to get and the circulating medium is based upon gold, gold becomes correspondingly scarcer with every country after it. There must be a contraction of the circulating medium. At this time when the great fabric of credit has crashed and lenders are forcing repayment in the gold nominated in the bond we have a still greater demand upon the world's gold resources. Credit which once circulated is withdrawn in times of stress. It ceases to circulate and it is just as much a circulating medium in good times as the dollar itself. If we have a scarcity of gold with the demand for it and there is a contraction of credit which circulates as money where are we going to get a circulating medium?

If in addition vast populations such as India circulate silver where will it go to make its purchases? To the country which recognizes its silver or to a country which does not? If England goes into the markets with silver and barters in silver and the United States barters with gold who is going to sell the goods, the country which circulates gold?

The East always has stood out for gold. Why?

WEST FAVORS SILVER

which does not? If England goes into the markets with silver and barters in silver and the United States barters with gold who is going to sell the goods, the country which circulates silver or the country which circulates sold?

The East always has stood out for gold. Why? Because it, lent gold and wants payment in the metal of the debt's contraction. But it is not, the same measure that the East asks to have back. If it lent gold when wheat was a dollar a bushel and gets back its gold today it gets back two bushels of wheat for one it lent. The one bushel of wheat when the debt was contracted may be worth the two bushels of wheat today in the eastern lender's till but the farmer who produces the wheat has to-return two bushels of sweat and labor to make up for the one bushel he borrowed. And if the lender were to eat his wheat he could eat two bushels of wheat instead of the one bushel he lent. But in gold which he cannot eat he has the worth of the two bushels now which he lent as one bushel of wheat yesterday. And he can buy other commodities with his returned gold from one-third to one-half less than he could when he lent it. He has an inflated measure of value while the producer has a deflated measure of value while the producer has a deflated measure of value.

Because the East is the lender and the West the borrower the specs are different when we consider silver as a circulating medium. The East wants the advantage of appreciated values as represented in gold; the West wants to return its debts to the East in the measure of value in which its loans were made. That is the reason we find today a growing demand for the recognition of silver in the West and the eastern bankers runhing to protect gold as the measure of value which they lent and which in reality they did not lend.

The Middle West wants silver because it wants to pay back one bushel of wheat which he lent regardless of the change in the physical effort to produce it.

So we go into the next campaign with silver a real issue when it takes two
