FLORA, Ore. (U.P.)—The lowly candle took its place among shrapnel and bullets as a deadly missile in a Flora high school science class. Shot was removed from shotgun shells and a three-inch piece of candle substituted. The candle was shot through inch-thick boards 15 feet away. A small piece of candle also was fitted into a .22 shell and was shot through a tin can.

Explains Shortage Men From Torrance On Aqueduct Job

While Torrance has been running slightly behind its quota of men employed on the Metropolitan water district aqueduct project recently, this city for the past five months has exceeded its share in wages and salaries. J. R. Jensen, official representative on the water board explained today. Due to the employment of so many Torrance residents as foremen, executives and skilled laborers, which are paid a higher wage scale than common laborers, the number of men from Torrance who are working on the aqueduct is slightly under the quota, but the money received by local residents is considerably over the quota, Jensen stated. A compilation of quota figures shows Torrance exceeded its quota of men in March by seven, in April by 2, and was under its quota in the following months as follows: May, one man; June, one man; July, six men; August, five men, and September 15 men. However, in each month, the money received by Torrance workmen exceeded the quota, due to the employment of local men in skilled or executive positions. In September, for example, when the number of men fell 15 below the quota, the wages and salaries received was $175 above the allotment, Jensen pointed out. YOUR DUTY

The Herald gratefully acknowledges receipt of the following poem, signed, "Zak." We don't know who the author may be, but we are pleased to publish his splendid contribution.—Editor.

I sit with my family in my home,
And my mind just wanders back,
To the days of the war when clouds hung low
And we carried a rifle and pack.
Those days we spent in the army camps
When youth was in its bloom
And of the ships that sailed across the sea
And carried us far from home.
The tears well up and my eyes grow dim
When I think of those who stayed
In foreign lands beneath the sod
After the debt was paid.
The cost cannot be priced in gold
To the men who spent those days
On the battle fields in a distant land
That Democracy might be saved.
I find in me there are no regrets
I am a better man today
For the things I saw on the battle fields
In that most bloody fray.
But still on the cloudy gloomy days
After these many years
Some of those horrors reappear
And my eyes grow dim with tears.
The (Veteran) is often criticised
And maybe justly so.
But we did our best in the time of need
Now pay the debt you owe.
This country is in a crisis now
That overshadows those years,
Will the blood that flowed on the battle fields
Prove vain and turn to tears?
Our homes are hung in the balance now,
Much more than in that day;
If we fail to enlist as the veteran did
And fight for the N. R. A.

Branch Bank Manager Explains 1933 Bank Act to Kiwanians

Bernard Vogelsang, manager of the Bank of America branch bank at Sixth and Alexandria, Los Angeles, and second vice president of the Los Angeles Chapter American Institution of Banking, spoke before the Kiwanis Club Monday night on the subject of "The Bank Act of 1933."

The speaker pointed out the events which preceded and led to the passage of the act, explaining that it provided for: First, a more rigid control of the extension of credit by member banks; Second, a premium on membership in the federal reserve system designed to bring all banks in the United States into a uniform banking system; Third, a further extension of the means by which the federal reserve board can control the money market; Fourth, a more definite placement of the responsibility for the management of banks and more rigid examination and control of their operation; Fifth, a rigid limitation of the activities of bankers to the business of banking, divorcing the security affiliates and forcing the private banker to choose between banking and the investment business; Sixth, a further protection for depositors' funds through new adjustments as to liquidity and capital through the insurance of deposits; Seventh, a further extension of branch banking and the recognition of the responsibility for the management of banks and more rigid examination and control of their operation; Eighth, elimination of the federal government from direct competition with banks through the elimination of the postal savings system.
