Permanency—built to stand for ages to come—that was the outstanding impression which the new Torrance post office building gave the Herald reporter as he was guided through the new building yesterday by Harold Hansen, general contractor. From the moment you enter the spacious lobby until you view the sturdy underpinning in the basement, you are conscious of the fact that Uncle Sam has built a structure which will endure for years and years to come.

The stately new federal building is indeed a credit to its builders, and no little praise should be given to Harold Hansen, general contractor, for the splendid job he has done. Mr. Hansen is also to be commended upon his loyalty to Torrance in patronizing as many local firms as he could. In fact, he paid a premium in order to use steel from the Columbia Steel mills. He could have brought steel from the east, which would have met government specifications, at a savings of 10 percent under the price he paid to the Soule Steel Company at Torrance, but he chose to patronize the local industry, the Herald was informed by an executive of the Soule company this week.

The electrical fixtures and all wiring were furnished by the Torrance Electric Shop, and the lumber was supplied by the local yards of the Consolidated Lumber Company. A number of Torrance residents were given employment on the job.

The new post office building measures approximately 61 feet by 67 feet, and cost $45,000 in addition to the site. It has two stories in front and a high basement under the entire structure.

The first floor plan consists of a spacious lobby, a large work room, approximately 63 feet by 35 feet, vault, private office of the postmaster, and women's rest room. Upstairs there is a "swing room" or lounge for rural carriers and other male employees, and a large toilet for men. The basement has several storage rooms, furnace room, and a private office for the postal inspector.

Lookout Gallery

Visitors at the new building Saturday will be interested in seeing the lookout gallery, a feature of all post office buildings. This dark passageway extends from the basement to the second floor, and contains lookout slots through which the postal inspector can see into every room in the building without the employes being aware of his presence. Entrance to the lookout gallery is through a private door in the basement to which only the inspector has the key. He may enter the building and leave without any regular employe knowing it. This secret inspection is provided to guard against tampering with the mail by dishonest employes. A private office off the lookout gallery is also provided for the inspector.

Modern Throughout

The Torrance building is the first post office to be equipped with full automatic steam heat control, according to Louis R. Smith, federal building inspector. It is a feat job, and if proven satisfactory, will be adopted in future buildings, Mr. Smith says. Temperature of the hot water in the plumbing system is also automatically controlled, and electrically cooled drinking water is supplied for employes.

The public inspection Saturday afternoon will be the last opportunity that anyone except postal employes will have to view the inner offices of the new building, and Postmaster Conner has extended a hearty invitation to everyone to come and see the splendid new building at that time.

TULARE, Cal. (U.P.)—A 19-year-old fig tree only 42 inches high is Tulare's claim to the championship for the world's smallest mature tree. Growing in a crack between a building and a cement alley, the tree has managed to exist despite the scarcity of sunshine and soil.

Former President Hoover Attacks 'New Deal'

Hearts Make Waste Prayed
