Townsend Club Hears Fine Program

Townsendites of Club No. 1 were well repaid by a fine program put on recently under the direction of Mrs. Minnie Collier, chairman of that committee. The Norman sisters, playing zither and violin duets, were especially well received. Jack Kent gave a well-rendered piano solo and played the accompaniment for his friend Kenneth Hall in popular songs.

Graceful, piquant and charming was little Miss Juanita Ritchie, seven years old, who gave two elaborate solo dances in lovely costumes. This club deplores the loss of its presiding officer, Leslie T. Armstrong, who has taken up residence in Pomona. The vice president, Mrs. Frances Clark, has been efficiently presiding in his place until the recent election called Mrs. Collier to the chair.

Tonight the club will be addressed by Leonard Roach, Republican candidate for Congress from this district. Visitors welcome. The club meets without exception every Thursday evening in the elementary school auditorium.

Paris Styles
By MARY FENTRESS
United Press Staff Correspondent

PARIS (U.P.)—Fur will play an important part in this winter's styles but fortunately inexpensive as well as expensive furs are being promoted by the smart Paris couturiers.

Nothing will ever take the place of ermine, mink, sable or silver fox for really dressy clothes, but lower priced and better wearing furs are exploited everywhere for day wear.

Furriers are able to do wonders with pony and cow skins and turn out finished products that are sleek, satiny and low priced. These flat skins are easily worked into smooth fitting garments that add to a slim, straight silhouette, whereas long-haired furs naturally add girth and bulk to the figure.

Black pony is used for daytime coats that follow either one of two styles. First and most popular is the fitted coat that buttons from a high and severe neckline to a nipped-in waist and then flares out in a full basque-like skirt. These coats frequently are trimmed with collar, revers, cuffs and wide belt of antelope or suede. The second style is that favored last season for sports coats—the full swagger silhouette which flares from a broadened shoulder yoke to a three-quarter length hem.

Shaved lamb is smart but is more expensive and less durable. Broadtail is equally popular but only the most expensive and shiniest skins make up well. Just plain goat is used for attractive daytime coats—usually in shaded gray tones made up like pony coats.

TODAY'S FASHION TIP
Lower priced furs such as pony, cow skin, and goat are used by Paris couturiers for daytime coats.

A Wild Goose Tale

As Told to MARION STEWART By ROMAN SEPULVEDA

Honk! Honk! Honk!

Wild geese winging over the Rolling Hills of Rancho Palos Verdes. We shielded our eyes from the bright afternoon sun to follow the flying wedge, Don Roman Sepulveda and I. Don Roman, Haciendaado; Don Roman, whose father, Don Diego, together with his brothers was first owner of this princely heritage, El Rancho de los Palos Verdes. Don Roman, who has lived to see the pastoral California of his boyhood with its herds and hides, its "leather dollars" and its leisured living, change into the California of today bustling with commercial activity and modern progress; who has watched a great world port grow up at the foot of his proud hills where once the anchoring of an occasional sailing vessel was an event calling for a week's celebration; who today applauds the wisdom of those who, wearied with the city's chaos are choosing to live on miniature ranches on these peaceful Rolling Hills where once his horses and his cattle roamed.

As the great birds passed from our sight a smile as bright as the autumn sun overspread Don Roman's handsome features and he gave a low, mirthful, contagious chuckle.

"Wild geese! They remind me... Did I ever tell you how we used to shoot them down here?"

"Well—Look toward the end of the harbor, down on the flats where the boulevard curves around the shore toward Wilmington. Before the dredging and filling that made our modern port was done that all used to be swamp land, under water at high tide. When the tides were out springs of fresh water came thru. In fact, it was down there that the big springs were that supplied the ships in the harbor with fresh water in the early days—'Los Tres Barrios,' they called them, the three barrels."

"Every afternoon just about this time of year the wild geese used to come in flocks, hundreds of them, flying low right over these hills. It always seemed as if the heights of Rancho Palos Verdes formed their landmark for harbor, just as they did for the ships sailing down the coast. A great noise those geese would make, whirring and honking, darkening the air, so great were their numbers. Straight for the marshes they would head and settle down there so thick the place was gray with them."

"Now—during the Civil war there were a lot of United States soldiers here. California really couldn't have been led out of the Union even by the most skillful of party managers, but at the outset it seemed to the government so far away in Washington to be in danger. So all thru those war years they kept a garrison of soldiers stationed over there at Wilmington. You can see their granary still, that long building on the flats at the harbor end of the Wilmington business district. That was where they used to unload and store their supplies brought in on lighters from the ships anchored out near Timm's Point. But the barracks were up back of the old landing, right near where Banning park is now.

"They had an old cannon mounted up there—an old four-pounder it was. Every afternoon at the season when the wild geese were flying they kept a soldier on look-out and when he'd see the birds coming he'd give the signal and the gunners would train their old field piece down on the slough and blaze away."

"It took two wagons to carry off the dead geese every shot."
