Banker Claims Postal Savings Competitive

The operation of the Postal Savings Bank system in communities where adequate banking service is already rendered by private institutions is being given study by the American Bankers Association, according to Hugh L. Clary, vice-president of the Bank of America.

"The original purpose of the Postal Savings Act was to provide noncompetitive savings facilities in communities where adequate banking service was not available," said Clary. "A survey has shown that the Postal Savings has worked in a direction exactly opposite to this."

"There are no postal savings banks in fourth class post offices, serving small communities where banking facilities might be inadequate. In the large metropolitan centers, where adequate banking facilities are present, the Postal Savings banks are most active," continued Clary.

He further stated that it is the desire of the banking studies committee to urge Congress at its next session to take steps to bring the operation of the Postal Savings Act more in line with its original purposes.
