

Women's Groups Cautioned Against Pitfalls of Hasty "Endorsements"

Dependence Upon "Intuition" Leads to Exploitation When Issues are Hustled Thru

Who runs the women's clubs?

"Why, the women, of course!" shout the ladies in a breath, a little annoyed at the presumptuous query, and eager to get on to the practical business of passing resolutions, appointing delegates and discussing agendas.

The men don't answer; they don't blink and they don't change expression—altogether a flawless demonstration of the time-tested tactics approved in poker and politics.

And since it isn't poker, it must be politics. Just what is the answer?

Sproul Sounds Warning

Unquestionably, the long lead men had over women in the world of politics gives them a vast advantage. Is this, then, the legitimate through which women's clubs occasionally are hustled into endorsements they ordinarily wouldn't make, on purely commercial issues of little public concern? Is it the sleight-of-hand which may transform almost any ingenuously presented proposition into a seemingly perfect parallel to formal, sanctioned club programs?

Or can women in general still comparatively guileless of business and political intricacies—depend, perhaps, on that old stand-by, "intuition," to sound the warning when their organizations are in danger of being exploited?

Dr. Robert Gordon Sproul, University of California president, thinks not. He cautions the clubs, "The more questionable a project, the more consideration should be given. It is your responsibility to make sure your platforms are not used for questionable motives—that they remain yours!"

Sound Advice Given

But how many women actually prefer to make their own decisions on important public affairs; to personally dig into matters and deduce inferences from facts?

The question forcefully presented itself to a group of California Business and Professional clubwomen recently, when their state leader, Carolyn Weber, said, "Don't be afraid of individualism; of adventuring a little mentally! Develop vision and leadership; they're vitally needed!"

Judgment is Sought

The men, who know very well their influence with women's organizations, may get a huge laugh out of the situation. It may even more greatly amuse those women who are content in their households, undisturbed by the problems of the world at large, for they can openly admit their political knowledge comes over the radio, and that they vote with their husbands.

But there's a better-than-average chance the ultimate satisfaction will be that of the clubwomen who continue to penetrate the maze and produce new, sound and valuable ideas, for more and more is their help solicited and their judgment sought in public affairs.
