BLIND INVENTOR . . . Lt. Commander Joseph B. Earnest, Chaplain Corps, U. S. Navy, and his simple, cheap "writing aid," which he invented after he recently became blind. Seeking no patent or return from his invention, he hopes all who need it will use the device.

It consists of 9x17 inch filing board with spring clasp with a notched strip of wood at both sides. Rubber bands are suspended across board via notches to guide pencil and permit forming lower parts of pendant letters like "j," "p" and "q."

Thumb tacks at top make good paper guide and a common paper clip is used to mark stopping place in event of interruption. "Pathetic scrawling lines are unnecessary if this aid is used," Commander Earnest, who lives at Vallejo, says. It costs less than a dollar, is easily made by anyone.

Really Good Food Doesn't Need Any Beauty Parlor Treatment

The brightest culinary tip in recent years was not released in a book for the benefit of cooks. It got little publicity among women, which was unfortunate. It came from a man, something of an epicure himself, and was passed along to his fellow members at a luncheon club—of all places to talk about good food.

"The average man," said William Allen White, distinguished editor of the Emporia Gazette, "sits down to his food and eats it, generally not knowing what he is eating—which is my idea of a colossal culinary mistake."

"A wide dietary range is a sign of wide culture. But a man usually kicks like a bay steer the minute he's exposed to new food—even before he tastes it. That, however, isn't his fault entirely. It's the fault of fool women trying to doll up food like landscaping. Putting panty ruffles on mutton chops! Laying red pimento across salad! Making their sherberts match their napery! Really good food doesn't need any beauty parlor treatment."

A little hard on the ladies, Mr. White—but right as rain from the standpoint of all the men ever heard discussing food. Probably the first rule concerning food that the average man would lay down, if asked, would be: "Don't disguise it. I like to know honestly what I'm eating. If it's fish, I don't want to be led to think it's steak. If it's spinach souffle, I don't want to think it's mint ice cream or vice versa. Good food, in its natural habitat and surroundings, is very inviting looking to a hungry man. Don't over-dress or over-decorate it on my account."

The woman whose husband finds gastronomic delight in many foods—from corned beef and cabbage to green turtle soup and Camembert—is a lucky woman indeed, for his cultural interests, according to the White thesis, probably are as broad as his dietary range. And a man whose wife serves his dinner so that with a minimum of exploratory work he can tell his foods apart, largely has her to thank for his cosmopolitan tastes.

Most men who entertain a particular distaste for a particular food likely first saw it so decked with frills and furbelows as to discourage an honest appetite.

If there's one place in the world where men don't care for mystery it's in their T-bone steaks.

Players Present "The Push" Here Tonight

Despite last-minute changes in the cast, the Torrance Community Players will present their second stage production "The Push" tonight in the Civic Auditorium confident that the three-act comedy will prove a success. Last night the group staged the show in dress rehearsal form at the Gardens American Legion hall.

The curtain time tonight is 8:15 o'clock. There has been no advance sale of tickets, the admissions being available only at the Auditorium box office. "The Push" was written and directed by William Fariss, who because one member of the cast was forced to drop out yesterday, will also play a role in the production.
