Oil Core Analysis Course Offered at Night College

Analysis of oil-well cores and application of the results to problems in oil-field exploitation and estimation of oil and gas reserves will be taught in a course to be offered by University College, evening division of the University of Southern California.

During its fall quarter, which starts Sept. 16 the evening division will include in its curriculum a course in "core examination and analysis" to be taught by John E. Sherborne, a new addition to the S. C. faculty as a lecturer in Petroleum Engineering.

Sherborne, who received his degree of bachelor of science from California Institute of Technology in 1934, will present the course on a semester basis, in room 206 of the new engineering building on the Trojan campus on Tuesdays from 6 to 9 p. m.

Also in the field of petroleum engineering will be the courses in "The Petroleum Industry," on Mondays from 6:30 to 8:30 p. m., taught by Everett Trostall, and "Subsurface Methods in Petroleum Engineering," Wednesdays from 6 to 8:20 p. m., taught by Harry P. Trostall's course will deal with the technology and economics of several divisions of the industry while Stolz's class will treat equipment and methods for obtaining subsurface information in wells, coring, electric logging, surveying, and sampling during the first quarter. Subsequent quarters will deal with further details of methods.
