Women 33% of Life Insurance Buyers In '43

An increase of nearly 30 percent in ordinary life insurance bought last year by women, who now make up 33 percent of the buyers of these policies, is indicated by a special study of a representative cross section of the life insurance business made by the Institute of Life Insurance.

While they make up one-third of the ordinary life insurance buyers, women, the study shows, are buying smaller amounts of life insurance than men, whose needs are greater in line with their traditional position as principal breadwinner of the family. In terms of dollar value, purchases by women accounted for only one-sixth of the ordinary life insurance issued last year by the companies embraced in the study. If this ratio holds good for the entire business, it would mean that women last year bought more than a billion and a third dollars of ordinary life insurance.

Women are also shown by the survey to play an important role in the purchase of industrial insurance. In 1943 they bought well over half the total number of industrial policies issued. Assuming the trends discussed in the study apply to the business generally, their purchases of industrial insurance in 1943 amounted to an indicated billion and a half dollars.

Increased by War
"The wartime activity and increased responsibility of women has had an important effect in emphasizing their interest in life insurance protection," the institute said, "and the present high ratio of total ordinary insurance buyers compares with only 20 percent as recently as 1940. Women have come to recognize the importance of life insurance as a part of their individual security programs as well as protection for dependents. They are important buyers of insurance today and will undoubtedly remain so after the war."

Purchases of insurance by women vary with individual companies depending upon the extent to which special attention has been given to selling and servicing women risks. Some companies are now making well over one-third of their ordinary sales to women and one company reports as much as 43 percent. In industrial life insurance, sales to women run as high as 58 percent in one company.

Analysis of last year's ordinary purchases by women as reported by the companies included in the survey indicates that more than three-fourths of the women buyers are in age groups under 30. There was a material increase of women buyers among workers in manufacturing industries, reflecting the influx of women war workers during the past year, but the increase was general among all occupational groups. Housewives also increased their buying of life insurance last year."
