Romance Of Fifty Million Years Is Exhibited Here

A worthy exhibit of natural crystals and pieces of petrified wood, with a romantic history of millions of years in the making, awaits visitors to the Torrance library for the remainder of this month.

Those believing the Petrified Forest of Arizona is the only producer of fossil wood, may be surprised to know that three national monuments mark the greater fossil record, says F. W. Schmidt, local mineralogical enthusiast, who is largely responsible for the Torrance exhibit. These in point of establishment are the petrified forests of Adamana and Holbrook, Ariz.; the Dinosaur Monument of Utah and the fossil Cycad National Monument in the Black Hills of South Dakota.

He lists other petrified forests in Washington and Nevada. "These few places do not, by any means, cover all of the fossil wood deposits," Schmidt declares, "in fact, there are a dozen or more places right here in California alone, where fine aged wood, covering millions of years of existence, can be found in most every county of this state."

Schmidt revealed that he welcomed schools in the area to view the aged display for the purpose of acquainting students with America's history, its seasonal changes down through the years and its fearsome darkness of more than 50-million years ago.
