Good Blood, Nerves, and Health

Without normal nerve function we cannot have normal health. Until this fact is realized by the masses, millions will be seeking health in vain. The nerve line is the health line. When anything goes wrong with that line, vitality is lowered and disease is invited.

In a previous article, the network of human nerves was shown to be like an electric grid system. Over the nerve lines flows a special kind of energy which activates and regulates every part of the body, just as electricity races over wires to "make the wheels go round." In the article mentioned above it was pointed out that pressure or tension at any point will disturb the normal work of the nerves and will, therefore, mark the beginning of ill health.

But freedom from pressure and tension is not enough to assure normal nerve function. Nerves are human tissue and therefore must be nourished. Their nourishment is supplied by the blood. Through a vast network of small arteries the blood stream feeds the nerves—just as it nourishes other parts of the body—with food materials picked up from the stomach and intestines and with oxygen taken from air cells in the lungs.

Endlessly this blood stream flows, for endlessly the nerves are at work. Day and night the nerve lines carry their load of vital energy, even to the most remote parts of the body. Even during sleep, although they are less active, the nerves carry on. All through the night they regulate the heartbeat and keep the lungs and other vital organs working while the body refreshes itself with sleep. Never for a moment, during the whole span of life, does the heart cease to beat. The blood, with its cargo of life-giving food, flows ceaselessly to all body tissues and nerves.

But let us not think that merely a constant supply of blood is sufficient. Normal nerve function depends on the quality of the blood. If the blood is deficient in necessary vitamins and minerals, the nerves will be undernourished and therefore will be unable to do their normal work. The machinery of the body is run by the nervous system, but the nervous system can work efficiently only when it is supplied with good, rich blood.

Health is freedom from disease. It is the cherished possession of those whose vitality is high. And vitality is high only when the blood is rich and the nerves are free.

Normal nerve function can be assured by correction of any postural distortions and restoring the mechanical integrity of the human body.

When the nerve system is working smoothly, unhampered either by mental or physical hazards, the answer is buoyant health.
