LAW IN ACTION

WILLS AND NATIONAL WELFARE

The laws and customs about disposition of property after death which men have held at different times reflect their deepest beliefs about destiny.

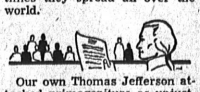
An Indian brave's weapons were buried with him. They would come in mighty handy on the "Happy Hunting Ground". When an Egyptian pharaoh was entombed, his richest goods lay beside him. With them he could live like a king in the next world. In the main, to destroy goods upon death meant that men could pass on very little.

Even in recent times many laws about man's disposition of property seem strange. In England, while you could leave your personal things as you chose, you had to leave your land to your oldest son. This was called primogeniture (first-born).

England wanted to keep her feudal structure intact. Feudalism rested upon land ownership. So after the battle of Hastings in 1066, the Norman conquerors decreed that a man must leave his land to his oldest son. This heir owed a loyalty to the next higher lord. He in turn owed "fealty" to another higher up, and so on until all swore loyalty to the king who owned all the land.

Without primogeniture, the English feudal system would fall apart. You needed large estates under that system.

Primogeniture affected the growth of the British Empire. Since younger sons could not inherit land they had to make their own way. The "gentry" went into the clergy, the army or the foreign service. In colonial times they spread all over the world.



Our own Thomas Jefferson attacked primogeniture as unjust. So the custom never began in any of our states. Here a man could leave his land to anyone he pleased. For we had a new frontier that stretched to the Pacific Ocean where you could stake out a new estate for yourself, if you did not get your father's land.

Only in recent times also could a married woman draw up a will and dispose of her property as she chose. Later columns will deal with your will and its effect.

NOTE: The State Bar of California offers this colmn for your information so that you may know more about how to act under our laws.

METHODIST CIRCLES MEET NEXT TUESDAY
