Information Operators Receive Mountains of Strange Questions

Regarded as a cross between Emily Post and the world almanac, telephone information girls not only answer thousands of queries about phone numbers, but hundreds of other questions from people throughout the Southland.

According to local Pacific Telephone manager Dick Pyle, the company has 1263 of these information girls on duty 24 hours a day in the big busy Los Angeles metropolitan area. During an average day they answer about 185,000 questions.

Most of the queries are from people who could find the answer by looking through the telephone directory, but sometimes a voice asks this kind of question:

"DO YOU HAVE a recipe for French dumplings?" or "How many teaspoons to a cup?" or "How do I press wool material without scorching it?" or "Can you recommend something for athlete's foot?" or "Is it good taste to wear pink with pale yellow?"

The girls don't answer such questions, Pyle said, because it delays answering a legitimate request from a subscriber. Queries of this sort are usually referred to the Public Library.

Of course, they get other ones too. Like this one: "There's a strange cat under my coffee table. What shall I do?"

OR THIS ONE, from a small boy: "Where do I call to order a baby sister?"

And then some like this: "How do I mix a martini?"

And this one from a sultry voiced woman who asked: "Are they having tours through General Trujillo's yacht?"

And now and then comes a question like this one from what sounded like a very little girl: "Where's my mommy?"

TO HELP KEEP information operators handling requests for telephone numbers at an average time of around 40 seconds per request, Pyle suggested that people hunting up recipes for French dumplings might consult a cook book and for strange animals around the house, call the Rumano Society.

He also suggested that checking the local phone directory for a telephone number is much faster than with the operator. If you're then unable to locate your party, dial the "113" girl and give her the correct spelling of the person's name in request and the address or local designation, such as Northeastern or Southern area.

The manager went on to say that by using these hints all telephone users will receive better and faster service. He added that anyone who wants a personalized directory for jotting down needed telephone numbers can receive one free by dialing the local business office.
