Longren Aircraft's new utility plane, the Centaur, was introduced to the public Monday at the Torrance Municipal Airport. Dubbed "the Flying Workhorse," the versatile Centaur combines the utilitarian features of a commercially licensed aircraft with the trim appearance of a private plane.

Built primarily as a workhorse to be operated from small and unimproved fields, the Centaur features wings which fold for storage in limited areas, permitting road transportation by conventional methods.

A removable, unobstructed loading door increases the plane's versatility as a cargo carrier. Equipped to handle four passengers and cargo when in use as a personnel carrier, the Centaur can accommodate six to eight persons in an emergency.

Other uses of "The Flying Workhorse" include: ambulance transportation, photographic and mapping work, voice transmission for advertising, and air raid warning and traffic direction. It has proven its value in the fighting of forest fires, laying of telephone wires, and in the preservation and feeding of marooned livestock.
