YOUR PROBLEMS
by Ann Landers

"The Roof Will Fall In . . ."

Dear Ann: Two years ago my husband divorced me for a younger woman — MUCH younger, in fact, his new wife is 23. I'm 44.

Our 21-year-old son was terribly grieved when his Dad left this to me. For a year he wouldn't speak to his father. After considerable pleading, the boy accepted an invitation to spend a week end with his father and the new bride. They have an attractive lodge which is open all year. The fishing and hunting is excellent. The boy has gone up four or five times and always seemed to enjoy it.

Last night his dad called and they had a long conversation. My son made some weak excuses for not accepting an invitation next week end. He finally said he had to play in a bridge tournament which was a lie.

After much hesitation he broke down and told me why he lied. On the last trip, it seems his father's young wife made some improper advances toward him. He said he never wants to take a chance on being alone with her again. Of course his father knows nothing of this.

Do you feel the boy should go up there again? Should he tell his father? I can't think straight on this subject — naturally. Please help me — Clarissa.

The boy should say nothing to his father. Dad will find out soon enough that his young chick is interested in roosters her own age. When the roof falls in it will be bad enough without having his own son in the act.

The boy should not accept future invitations to the lodge. He should make every effort to avoid a shameless hussy who would pursue a youngster right under her husband's nose. If it's his father, and not the hunting and fishing the boy is interested in, he can visit with Dad in town.

Dear Ann: I went to work in this office because it has the highest marriage rate in town. Last year seven girls married. Follows they met at their jobs and here.

There must be something wrong with me because I have not been able to land a date and I've been here two months. I'm not beautiful but I dress in good taste and make the most of the better than average figure.

So certain young man in this office has me going around in circles. He's single, good-looking, and during work hours shows real interest but he never mentions taking me out. Al-
