Ann Landers

Ed say you've had it, and this last request should put an end to the availability of your husband's shoulder.

Dear Ann Landers: I read the sad letter from Babs in your column, and my problem is worse than hers. She was complaining because her mother wouldn't allow her to ride in a car with a boy. Well, I'm 16 and my mother won't let me date.

I know several nice fellows but they stay away from me because the word is around that I can't go out with boys. Naturally, this makes me self-conscious. Also, I'm awkward and shy around boys because I haven't had any experience being alone with one.

The few times I've been to boy-girl parties I've had a miserable time. I freeze up when a fellow asks me to dance and I know my face must get very red. Please help me. I'm afraid my mother's strictness is ruining my life.—EDITH

Dear Edith: A girl 16 should be permitted to date. I hope your mother will reconsider and give you the freedom that young people need for normal development.

The only way a girl can learn to conduct herself with the opposite sex is by being around them. Sit down with your mother and decide on ground rules—how many dates you can accept a month, the age limit of the boys you can date, what time to be in. If you approach the problem logically, and not hysterically, you'll have a much better chance. Good luck.

Dear Ann: I'm doing a slow burn as I write this letter. I have a wonderful husband who works very hard. I'm a waitress at night because we need the extra money to pay the mortgage on the house and keep our growing family in shoes and groceries.

I have never complained because I do a day's work at home and another day's work between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m. I'm thankful the good Lord has given me the strength to do all this. But, my mother-in-law makes me so mad I can't see straight.

When my husband told his mother I had this waitress job, she piped up, "It must be awfully hard on you to have a wife who is gone all night!"

The way she said it you'd think I was out burning around. To make matters worse, instead of saying something in my defense, my husband just sat there like a dog who was suffering and looked terribly sad. What about this? Who is right?—Mrs. JM

Certainly your husband should have said something, his silence let you down. But since he didn't, brief him for next time and forget it.

Your mother-in-law sounds charming. Give her the old ear-to-ear treatment. In one and out the other.
