To those who must labor on
Labor Day

Each year we set aside one day to honor American Labor — not just because people work but for the great strides Labor has made in obtaining a better life for the average American worker.

But what about the people who always labor on Labor Day?

Seems like every time we go to a Labor Day parade or rally we see the same people working.
Policemen: holidays usually mean more work for them. Firemen: You may not see them but they are right there when you need them. Waitresses: They usually work overtime on a holiday like this to handle the larger crowds.
Street Cleaners: This is the guy who REALLY takes a beating on holidays. Gas station attendants: They pump gas 'til they're weary on a summer afternoon.
Newspaper typographers,
printers, linotypers,
stereotypers, editors,
reporters, circulation men,, and, of course all those people on radio and TV who bring you the finest, fastest news anywhere in the world: They CAN'T take a holiday.

Those, of course, are not all the people who labor on Labor Day. They represent only a small segment. We've never taken a survey of it, but probably half of the total working force works on a holiday.

If you're staying home or planning to roam on Labor Day, give a thought to those people working on your day off.
Make life a little easier for the cop by driving extra careful; give the fireman a break and put out open fires and cigarettes when you're finished; help the street cleaners by putting trash in containers and not at your feet; smile at that tired waitress who's been watering dry kids and pampering tension-
weary parents all day.
After all, it's Labor Day for them, too.
See you next week.
