Northrop Exec Says Management Must Provide Quality Standards

Management must play the key role in establishing higher standards of quality and reliability in production necessary for improved effectiveness to today's complex weapon systems.

This management responsibility was outlined by Richard R. Nolan, Northrop Corporation Vice President and General Manager of the company's Northair Division, to more than 400 top industry management officials and engineers of the American Society for Quality Control, Los Angeles Section.

QUALITY and reliability can be improved, the Northrop official declared, by a management program that strictly requires:

- (1) A clear, definitive communication of the job to all departments;
- (2) improved worker attitude toward product integrity with minimum penalty on cost and schedule;

(3) a more simple specification - communication link between design and manufacturing to insure design objectives are met.

In an address entitled "Top Management's Philosophy on Quality and Reliability," Nolan stated that low volume production of modern weapon systems under highly compressed time schedules, presents unique communication problems between design and manufacturing elements of an organization.

"MANAGEMENT," he said, "must bridge this gap by improving methods of coordinating department responsibilities and establishing the framework of reliability effort within each operating unit."

The meeting, held at The Institute of The Aerospace Sciences in Los Angeles, spotlighted the reliability and quality program of Northrop Corp.
