"Because they are better educated and more articulate, and because they often have a choice of 4 or 5 super markets to shop," says Daniel F. Gerber, president of one of the nation's oldest names in baby food making, "they are an important influence in setting higher marketing standards."

"The many magazine and newspaper features as well as books written about nutrition, improved packaging, labeling and methods of distribution, have taught our customers that their reactions to advancements or omissions in these fields are closely studied by companies," Mr. Gerber points out.

These comments were prompted by the upcoming Baby Week season (April 29-May 6) when makers of baby products turn the spotlight on their special group of customers.
