

Does Your Voice Have A Gravel-Bed Twang?

"Doesn't she sound like Irene?" the woman asked, turning in agony to her husband.

"God, yes!" he muttered. "I didn't think there could be two such horrible voices in the whole world. A voice like that goes right through me."

They were talking about a woman at the motel pool who was trying to teach some youngsters to swim. She beat those poor children into submission with a sound that I can best describe as a Brooklyn-type voice—course, harsh, brash and scaled at about as attractive a pitch as a fingernail scraped across a blackboard.

You may have observed individuals caught unexpectedly in a rainstorm gathering their personal possessions and running wildly for shelter.

By Count Marco

After about 30 minutes of exposure to that painful voice everyone around the pool, including me, fled with that same hurried desperation.

Later in the evening, in a cocktail lounge where I was doing some additional research, I sat in a booth next to a young, good-looking American couple.

They talked quietly through several cocktails. As there was little background noise, I tried to listen in on their conversation. Even though they did not have their heads together I still couldn't catch a word they said, and you know how sensitive my hearing is.

"What a contrast to that pool woman," I thought.

Both situations reminded me of what my aunt the Contessa says: "If a voice is heard by a third person who is not a member of the same party, no matter how closely they may be seated, the voice is too loud and the speaker is not only bad-mannered but ill-bred."

You've been given a voice to communicate with—to use, not abuse. If you have something to say that is important enough for an entire room to hear, and very few of you do, get yourself a lecture platform.

If it's just idle conversation, keep it at idling speed, soft and comforting.

And this, my dears, is one of the best pieces of advice you can receive to charm and hold a man. See if I'm not right.
