The Brown Bag Is A Texas Trademark

They may have many yellow roses in Texas, but from what I've seen, they have a lot more brown paper bags.

There are two types of liquor establishments in Texas, designed by the Texas men, undoubtedly to protect their women. And they obviously must love them to take such pains to guard them from the alcoholic addiction affecting women in other states.

A woman in Texas cannot walk into a cocktail lounge, climb on a bar stool and order a drink from the bartender. She has to bring her own bottle and pour her own drink. The bar provides her with the mix, glass and ice for a nominal fee, and that's all. No other hands but hers can touch the bottle.

First, however, she purchases her liquor at some local liquor stand and she must remember to buy before the closing hour, 10:30 p.m., or she'll be stuck with beer.

The bottle, for some unknown reason, is always placed in a brown paper bag. This is, of course, about as popular in the South as were the old-fashioned carpet bags they raised so much fuss about.

No matter how elegantly a woman in Texas may dress, there is just no disguising that bottle in that brown paper bag stuck under her arm. Someone who could figure a way to cover bottle more becomingly would probably make a lot of drinks.

It's quite a sight to see the number of different sizes and shapes of bottles in front of them. Mon Dieu! Cocktail time never looked like this in Rome or Paris.

But I'd like to imagine this sort of situation existing in a city like San Francisco on Friday nights when the basic-black-andpearl girls go out on the town. Crowded as the cocktail lounges are, with women standing and milling around, it would be something to see them clutching a cigarette in one hand, a fifth of gin tucked under one arm, the vermouth under the other, and holding a glass.

What consternation could result if your dearest friend turned to you and said, "Here, honey, hold my bottles while I go powder my nose."

If a woman in Texas desperately needs a drink, she marches into the nearest beer bar with her own brown paper bag and climbs aboard a stool. She takes a bottle out of her brown paper bag, opening it with as much feminintiy as any woman can have who has to open her own fifth in a public bar. She pours and drinks and drinks and
