"That grouchy guy next door wants to see you about something, Pop!"

Law in Action

Park Ridge would let nobody but the United Chest ask gifts door to door without city council permission. The city did this to protect householders from annoyance and possible fraud.

One charity asked the city to let it solicit funds door to door. But the council said no; the charity could solicit downtown or it could join the United Chest and get a share of the take. But it could not go door to door. The charity sued the city, saying it denied free speech contrary to the constitution. The court agreed with the charity.

Walter Knott Speaks Here For Bruinsma

BUT A CITY can regulate door-to-door businesses. It can grant or deny business licenses. Yet no city can deny a speech in favor of charity, a political party, or a religious group, in front of your house so long as he does not greatly disturb the peace of the neighborhood.

In another case the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a city law that called for a license to seek members for any dues collecting organization. The Court held that no labor union or political group needed a license to seek members. Such solicitation is part of the citizens' right to spread ideas, to speak freely.

IN ANOTHER case the Court allowed a religious group to hand out its literature and to collect money for its cause without first getting city permission. The courts have often said that real abuses of door to door solicitations can well be corrected or prosecuted after they take place.
