If the Shoe Fits, Wear It and Smile

by Count Marco

I remember the days when a real woman never went outdoors without a hat, and gloves, but something has happened. First the hat disappeared, then the gloves were left home, and now, mon Dieu, you don't even wear shoes.

What are the women of this country coming to? I notice this particularly at dances where you take your shoes off and attack a dance floor like barefooted Indians hot-footing it for rain.

When I commented on the number of shoeless women on one dance floor, a woman said, "Well, after all, what if your feet hurt?" Now, isn't that a typical small-minded question. If your feet hurt it's for one of two reasons: You've never worn shoes before, or the ones you have are too small. Simple, isn't it?

I particularly dislike that horrible gyration called the Twist. It is partly responsible. It's bad enough with the shoes on, but without shoes it's deplorable.

It's the fault of American mothers, every bit of it. First you lazy mothers, so as not to have to wash and iron dresses, permitted your daughters to get out of their dresses into shorts. Now they don't wear shoes.

What will they get out of wearing next? From my critical viewpoint, there isn't much left.

Perhaps the return of the high-button shoe (which is seriously trying to make a comeback) will help, but I don't look for too much success in that category.

When shopping for shoes, forget those floor mirrors. Buy a shoe that feels absolutely comfortable. Your feet have a great deal to do with your disposition. If your feet hurt your face reflects that hurt.

If an man can wear a collar and tie and keep his pants on, you can keep your shoes on, Lucy. Otherwise head for the hills, because that's where you belong. You are certainly not fit for civilization.

To you others who are sensible I say, bless you; you are helping me in the battle to preserve femininity.
