Thomas emphasized the role which he says the family must play. "I don't send my children to church," he volunteered. "I take them with my wife." The veteran assemblyman warned crainst rolying too much on against relying too much on the law. He did admit stronger laws are needed, but added letters to legislators do little good. Thomas suggested per-sonal contacts and visits, work to create a strong public opin-ion, and a simple, strictly non-partisan issue.

SUMMARIZING the discus-sion, Barnes drew heavy ap-plause when he disagreed with Thomas on the effect of laws. Barnes declared "strong legis-lation, strictly enforced would help greatly." help greatly." After the panel discussion

After the panel discussion, questions were asked of the panel members. Citing specific cases, the panel reinforced its stand and argued for stronger laws in concert with parental and community action. Guests at the meeting in-cluded Assemblyman Charles E. The require-ment that distributors have prior knowledge the material is obscene makes it difficult to obtain convictions and allows many peddlers of smut to re-main free despite a ruling the material is obscene.

MONBOISSE said the original state law was passed in 1859 and amended in 1871. "Not until 1961 was it again amended," he added. The at-torney general's office will continue its efforts to get a stronger law, said Monboisse. Assemblyman Thomas, ob-viously disagraeding with most Assemblyman Thomas, ob-viously disagreeing with most of the references to the law, declared, "You cannot legis-late morals." He said primary responsibility is with parents rather than the legislature. He quickly added he had voted for all strong anti-obscenity laws which had been intro-duced in the legislature. Thomas emphasized the role
