If You're Going to Get Mumps, Have Them Early

By K. H. SUTHERLAND, M.D., County Health Officer

Mumps is one of the few contagious diseases that a doctor would rather see a child get than not, and the sooner the better. In the young child the disease is not usually at all serious, but if the attack is postponed until adolescence or adulthood it may result in serious complications, including mumps encephalitis, meningitis, or sterility.

Cases of mumps are generally more prevalent during late winter and early spring, and the present year is not an exception. Since the first of the year, 2469 cases of the disease have been reported in Los Angeles County as against 1178 for the same period of 1963, and the rise continues. During the week ending May 2, some 203 cases were recorded compared with 129 the previous week and the past 5-year median of 105. This just means that more than the usual number of mumps cases are occurring in Los Angeles County this year.

THE CAUSE of the disease is the mumps virus. These ineffective agents are spread from the sick person to a susceptible one either by direct contact with the saliva droplets of the infected individual or by contact with articles he has contaminated.

Following infection with the mumps virus, signs of illness appear in from 14 to 28 days, most usually in about 18. The first symptom may be a swelling of one or both of the salivary glands which are located below and slightly in front of the ears (parotids). Other salivary glands may also be involved, and in older children and adults certain organs, including the sex organs, may be affected as well.

INVOLVEMENT of the sex glands is reported to occur in about 25 per cent or more of adult males afflicted with mumps and in about 5 per cent of women. Since this occasionally results in sterility (about one per cent of cases in males), doctors generally make no effort to prevent the disease in young children.

Mumps is infectious a few days before symptoms of the illness are apparent and remains so until the swelling disappears. Even in the absence of swelling and the common signs of the illness, this period of infectivity persists.

IMMUNITY following an attack of mumps is generally the rule and is usually of lifelong duration. Second attacks do occur and perhaps even a third, but they are rare.

A vaccine is available that will prevent mumps, and this is usually given to susceptible individuals past puberty in the event of an epidemic of the disease, and such susceptibility can be determined by a skin test. The vaccine has limited value since the degree and duration of the resulting immunity it provides is not clearly established. Consequently, vaccination of the young is not recommended, particularly since it is desirable that children have the disease before puberty. Convalescent mumps serum may also prevent the disease or modify its severity in the event that it does occur.

All patients should be confined to bed during the active stages of mumps. This will serve to lessen the possibility of the complications that may occasionally occur.

In all cases where the disease is suspected, the patient should be promptly placed under the supervision of a physician.

Opportunity comes to the prepared. —Dr. Rudolph Ganz
