Lawmaker Asks Questions On Firearm Legislation

By CHARLES E. CHAPEL
Throughout the history of the United States of America, whenever a well-known person has been killed by a firearm, there has been national interest in legislation, state or federal, to control or regulate in some manner the possession, carrying, and use of firearms. This applies to men killed in duels, the assassination of Presidents of the United States and other public officials and the murder of both innocent people and gangsters. It is natural and logical that the citizens of the United States are concerned when they learn about the death of any well-known individual. The spontaneous reaction gives rise to the exclamation: "There ought to be a new law to prevent the recurrence of such a horrible thing!"

When I first heard about the assassination of the late President Kennedy, my immediate reaction was one of doubt. I thought that surely there must be some mistake, probably because I could not see why anyone would want to kill President Kennedy, whether they agreed with everything he said and did or disagreed with him.

Some who spoke previously in favor of the passage of the resolution seemed to dwell on his personal charm, which he had in abundance, and on his work as President, but I spoke on what I thought was the true justification for the award of the Congressional Medal of Honor, which is the simple fact that his conduct in World War II was far above and beyond the call of duty. Those who spoke after me followed the same line of reasoning. The resolution passed and went to the U.S. Congress.

not necessarily the regulation of possessing, registering, or firing guns. The real issue is this: "Can we, the people, through our Sacramento, or in Washington, D.C., enact any laws which will effectively prevent the illegal killing of human beings?"
If our answer is in the affirmative, then I ask how such laws should be worded, and also I ask how they should be enforced? These are not rhetorical questions. I shall appreciate it greatly if you care to answer these vital questions by writing to me at P.O. Box 327, Redondo Beach.

My SECOND reaction was the hope that if it were true that he was shot, that he would recover. My third reaction was a silent prayer that if he had been shot that he would recover and be restored to good health in mind and body. My fourth reaction was the ancient question asked by millions of people all over America "What can be done to prevent such a thing from happening again?" My fifth reaction was: "Should we enact new federal or state laws on firearms?"

All these reactions went through my mind faster than the twinkle of an eye. My reactions came like lightning for the simple reason that I have been collecting, shooting, and writing about firearms since I was a youngster in a small town in Iowa. Anyone who has studied the history of the United States knows that several Presidents and thousands of other prominent people have been killed by firearms.

Any death is a tragedy, whether death comes from so-called natural causes, an automobile accident, poison, a disease, a club, a dagger, or a firearm. Death is especially horrifying to Americans when it comes to a President of the United States of America because, along with the National Colors, the Stars and Stripes of our Flag, the President of the United States is always more than a human being. Around him is draped the cloak woven from our hopes and aspirations for a better world for ourselves, our children, and our children's children.

PERSONALLY, I did not vote for the late President Kennedy, but I had great respect for his outstanding record as a young officer of the United States Navy in World War II, and I had respect for him as our President, just as I owe a duty of respect for any President, because all Presidents are entitled to respect, both in their capacity as President and in their capacity as Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces of the United States, set forth in the Constitution of the United States.

These are not idle words. During the recent long session of the California Legislature, I spoke on the floor of the Assembly for four minutes, urging the passage of a resolution asking the
