

Three Rs Emphasized in Summer School Classes

The boy put down the microphone and pushed the button. He laid his book on the table and prepared to listen to the tape recording. In a moment he would be able to hear himself reading, and learn from what he heard.

In another section of the room the teacher was sitting alone with a girl who read aloud to her audience of one. Less than a dozen other children sat at tables studying their books.

At first glance the summer school looked undersized. In actuality, the principal had deliberately planned the hour so that the remedial reading teacher would have a small group to work with.

The place was Newton School; the time was 10 a.m.; and the principal was Carl Wallner.

BY MAKING use of new "team teaching" methods the principal had pooled the students of three teachers and re-distributed them so that children who needed extra attention in reading could get it.

In order to put team teaching into practice, he converted the cafeteria, which was to go unused as an eating place during the summer, into an art classroom. The oversized art group spread its papers and crayons over the cafeteria tables. At the end of the day projects would remain on top of the tables in their half-done state—because nobody would be using the tables.

Rounding out the teaching team was the music teacher. As 45 children sat silently in the converted classroom, with desks piled by the wall for the summer months, and chairs arranged audience-style in rows, he explained the sounds of the glockenspiel.

This scene took place yesterday. But it could have been any day during the summer school.

AT NEWTON SCHOOL, as at all schools in Torrance, emphasis during the summer is on the three Rs. But supplementing the basic course of reading, writing, and arithmetic is the addition of art, music and physical education.

For an hour and a half each day, Newton students in grades four through eight leave their homes and participate in the team-teaching experience. The rest of the day is devoted to the routine schedule.

With the exception of Friday, a series of special events has been set up for Fridays which will include an art show, a science fair, a sing-along assembly, a track meet and a talent show.

dents are putting out a school paper every week.

Although summer school only lasts six weeks, academic standards at Newton, as at all schools in Torrance, are the same as those during the regular school year. Report cards will be issued.

Where then does summer school differ? It isn't in the program. And it isn't in the standards of work expected. It's in the spirit of the thing. The children who come to summer school are there because they want to be there. And 250 children chose to spend six weeks of their summer going to class at Newton School.
