Dangerous Ticks Rare in Southland, Doctor Says

By K. H. SUTHERLAND, M.D., County Health Officer

There are very few dangerous ticks in Southern California, and the one most often encountered in Los Angeles County is the pajaroello. Every so often someone gets bitten by a pajaroello and reports of the incident eventually reach health authorities. Although the bite of this tick is not poisonous, the wound may become serious if the victim is allergic to the tick's salivary fluid. Then there is always the hazard of a secondary infection, particularly in those cases where first aid is inadequate or lacking. Pajaroello ticks are native to Mexico, but more than 600 years ago they were observed in the mountainous regions of Central California and by 1941 had also been noted in certain areas within Los Angeles County, specifically in the foothills around Newhall and Malibu.

During the early 1940s, pajaroellos were found only in the litter that accumulates under oak trees. More recently they were also observed under pines and around chaparral plants, those low-growing shrubs indigenous to the local foothills. The ticks have remained so few in number that their presence is not considered significant.

The average pajaroello tick is about one-fourth of an inch long but may measure twice as much after a full meal. It is generally a mottled brownish-gray, has a hard leathery back, and when engorged with blood resembles a bean in shape and size.

THE TICK will feed on any warm blooded animal including man. It rarely causes discomfort at the time of attachment to the human victim, as its saliva appears to contain a substance that deadens sensation in the area of operation. When feeding, it usually remains on the host for about 5 to 20 minutes, although occasionally the time may extend to several hours. Considerable pain and intense itching are not uncommon following the bite of the pajaroello. These reactions may occur before the tick drops off, soon afterwards, or may be delayed as much as 24 hours. If the individual is slightly allergic to the tick's saliva, the wound may start oozing serum within a few hours and a dark purple ring or eruption may appear around the affected area. Swelling may also be evident.

A SYSTEMATIC reaction, such as occasionally happens in the cases of bee sting, may occur when the individual is especially sensitive to the pajaroello's saliva. This occurrence is fortunately quite rare. First aid treatment consists of removing as much of the tick saliva from the wound as is possible and this is done by suction, using the mouth or a suction apparatus for about 5 minutes. An antiseptic and a sterile dressing should then be applied if available. Incision of the bite is not recommended as it greatly adds to the danger of secondary infection, while irritation of the affected area by friction or scratching should be avoided.

In those cases where the tick is observed embedded in the skin, it should be removed with care. The use of heat or vaseline is sometimes effective in causing the little animal to loosen its hold, but if it remains stubbornly attached to the victim a doctor should be consulted.

PRECAUTIONS against pajaroello bites should be taken by those persons who go into tick-infested areas. High boots and protective clothing are recommended, and tick repellents may also provide some protection. It is not considered advisable to rest or sleep in those places where the tick is likely to be found, for it is at such times of inactivity that the slow-moving tick maneuvers most successfully to attach itself to the host.

Whenever local or systemic complications occur following the bite of the pajaroello, medical advice should be obtained. In nearly all cases, however, the condition generally clears up in from 4 to 6 weeks.
