25,000 HEAR ROOSEVELT

James Roosevelt's street-corner campaign throughout California in his bid for the governorship has proved beyond a doubt that he is a more popular candidate than the incumbent governor, according to George E. Outland, Roosevelt's state campaign director.

Outland said in a pre-election statement that Roosevelt, Democratic gubernatorial candidate, will have spoken to approximately a quarter-million Californians before the June primaries and that his audiences had numbered up to 10,000 in a single appearance.

"By the time of the primary elections," Outland continued, "Mr. Roosevelt will have spoken directly to about one out of every 20 registered California voters in his street-corner talks and given them a chance to ask him, face to face, any questions they have. He has, furthermore, answered his questioners directly so that they know exactly where he stands on vital state issues."

In addition to his street-corner audiences, Outland estimated Roosevelt had reached "many more thousands of Californians" through his state-wide radio broadcasts and television appearances.
