Two Hours Off to Vote Moving, Ruled OK for Workers Must Sell

Any voter in California who works on election day has an absolute right to take two hours off from work during the day without loss of pay in order to cast his vote, State Atty. Gen. Brown ruled this week.

Brown said that any person employed by any firm or State and local government is entitled to a twohour period off from work during the day whether or not his usual work day would allow him two consecutive free hours before or after work when the polls

His opinion overruled two previous opinions issued by the office and came as the result of recent Supreme Court rulings upholding State laws providing for time off for voting.

California law says that a voter employed in California is entitled to two consecutive hours off from work on election day in order to vote without being liable to penalty or deduction in salary.
