being developed under the nathe B-70, the Air Force announced today.

Under the Weapon System Manager concept, the Los Angeles aircraft firm is responsible for development of the entire, system required to put a bomb on a target, it was explained.

After an intensive two-year design competition, it was announced last December, that North American Aviation, Inc., had won the contract upon the unanimous recommendation of the Strategic Air Command, the Air Materiel Command and the Air Research and Development

The B-70, is capable of speeds in excess of 2000 miles per hour at altitudes above 70,000 feet. "We are well into preliminary design engineering," Ray Rice, company vice president and general manager of the Los Angeles division, declared, "and are now more convinced than ever that the B-70 will give the Strategic Air Command a unique retaliatory capability which utilizes technical advancements in many fields as well as the hardto beat judgment of the human
