Ban on Industry Fuel Oil Helps Clean Air of Smog

The five-month ban on factory burning of fuel oil during the summer improved the quality of the air over the Los Angeles Basin. Air Pollution Control Officer Smith Griswold reported to the Board of Supervisors this week.

In a final evaluation of the effects of Rule 62, which required major users of fuel oil to burn only natural gas from May 1 through Sept. 30, Griswold said the measure improved visibility in the coastal areas, eliminated damage to growing vegetation, and reduced sulfur dioxide in the atmosphere.

He recommended that Rule 62 be continued as scheduled for six months during 1960, and said that he would recommend further extensions of the ban as quickly as sufficient natural gas became available.

The APCD's evaluation report estimated that emissions of sulfur dioxide from power plants and refineries were cut from 318 tons to 15 tons a day, while oxides of nitrogen were reduced by 46 tons a day, and aerosols by 14 tons.

During the period of the ban visible discharges, or plumes, from large fuel-burning installations were eliminated completely, and visibility in coastal areas showed improvement.

Damage to vegetation produced by the combustion products of sulfur stopped when fuel oil burning stopped, and reappeared when fuel oil burning again began Oct. 1.
