It's A Wise Parent

A Common Sense Approach to Your Child

By Janice Coe

Dear Miss Coe,

We're leaving the decision up to you. My daughter is seventeen and a junior in high school. She gets good grades, and is especially talented at writing.

She is engaged, ring and all, to a young man who is a college junior and comes from a good family. We feel that the kids are well suited to each other and will have a very happy marriage.

The problem is this... although they originally agreed to wait until they were both through school, they now want to be married no later than this summer.

My daughter tells me kiddingly that they'll get more wedding presents if they're married this year, because her boy friend has a sister who is also scheduled to get married next year, and friends and relatives would have to split their gifts. She also says that it's too much to ask of them to wait that long to live together since they are so much in love. What do you advise?

Mrs. L.F.

Dear Mrs. L.F.

"Marry in haste, repent at leisure."

That old folk saying probably sounds horribly old fashioned to your daughter. But almost everything that has stood the test of time has validity. Those particular words may not apply to everyone... but there are enough instances to prove that it's generally true.

As for the "reasons" your girl gives for marrying before she and her fiancé have finished school... the first is material and trivial, a sad commentary on the materialistic outlook we tend to give our children. A successful marriage is not based on the number of wedding presents received!

The second reason is more serious and goes deeper into attitudes that should have been developed since childhood. You might point out to her that the hasty war-time marriages that were entered into because the kids felt they couldn't bear not to have each other, are, for the most part, the ones that ended in "Dear John" letters. Once the young man was overseas, there was usually another fellow around who could nicely satisfy the same need.

Obviously, your daughter is planning a large wedding. Ask her what she thinks will be the reaction of the guests she is expecting to be so generous with their presents... at the wedding of a high school kid who hasn't proved in any way that she is capable of being a woman. She might not enjoy the snickers and whispers that will abound!
