Torrance's Camping Program Seen in National Magazine

Torrance's progressive camping program is featured in an article in the March issue of Recreation magazine, published by the National Recreation Association.

Diane Link, recreation leader in the Torrance Recreation Department, described the program which enables children to start with elementary camping skills and then advance to an eight-day overnight camping trip.

The article was one of several dealing with camping in a special issue.

Torrance conducts a series of preliminary sessions known as a traveling day camp which visits each school and park to give the children an introduction to camping skills. This is followed by four five-day camping sessions held at different parks in Torrance. At these sessions children learn more camp skills and practise camping out for one night. Children who have attended these camping sessions then go on an eight-day camping trip at Torrance's Big Bear Lake mountain camp.

The National Recreation Association is the nonprofit organization that seeks to help everyone make best use of leisure. John Collier, is available to give the Torrance recreation department on-the-spot assistance.

Recreation magazine may be bought from the National Recreation Association, 8 W. 8th St., New York 11. Copies are 50 cents each.

Torrance's population is 105,213, according to Lee Schlenns, superintendent of buildings.

Mean temperature in Torrance is 53 for winter and 68 for summer.
