A continuing automobile accident study, carried on by the Cornell University Automotive Crash Injury Project, shows that of the 30,000 lives lost in the nation annually through motor vehicle accidents at least 5500 could be saved by the use of the car safety belt.

This research project also disclosed that major injuries resulting from automobile accidents could be reduced about 30 per cent if seat belts were installed in all cars. Nevertheless, despite this report, comparatively few cars are so equipped, and new car dealers report that safety belts are the hardest of all the "extras" to sell.

Most drivers know that a car is safer to drive when in good mechanical condition, that safe driving practices should be followed, and that the person behind the wheel of a car should never rely on the other driver to do the right thing. However, fewer persons are aware of the extent that an individual's physical condition may influence his driving.

It is a well known fact that a sleepy driver is just as much of a menace on the road as a drinking one, but safety experts are of the sets can also turn a normally safe driver into a dangerous one.
