

Apricot Conserve

Orbiting around the earth, or journeying to the moon may sound fantastic to most of us, but now that the space age has become a reality, we may all be planning trips never dreamed of a decade ago.

Our manner of living changes, and even foods may vary in package form and in availability, but there are certain foods that never change. Honey is one that has, through the centuries, proven itself indispensable, not only for festive foods but in every day use. Beekeeping methods have been improved; display packages have become more attractive, but man has not altered the habits of the bees, nor duplicated the food produced by them. Honey, according to earliest records, was one of man's first foods considered as priceless and used in great ceremonies and celebrations.

Food scientists have declared honey to be a natural, unrefined nutritionally valuable food.

Honey may be had in the comb, or in cut comb form, in chunks, finely granulated or creamed honey, and extracted. Extracted honey is the type which has been removed from the comb.

When and if trips to the moon become common, honey may well be a part of the lunch as the simple sugars make up the content, the utilization of which puts no tax upon the digestive system. Low temperatures, or even freezing will not injure the color or flavor of honey.

Here is one good way to make fillings for sandwiches to be eaten at home or en route to an unknown destination.

Honey Apricot Conserve
1 cup dried apricots
1 1/2 cups honey
3/4 to 1 cup chopped walnut meats

Rinse apricots in hot water, drain and put through food chopper, using fine blade. Heat honey, remove from heat, add apricots and nuts, and stir to blend. Pour into sterilized glasses; seal with paraffin. Let stand 2 weeks before using. Makes approximately 2 pints.

Good on toast and hot biscuits, too.
