Moving Parents Offered Advice

This year, when 40 million Americans move, millions of children will be torn away from their familiar surroundings, their schools and their playmates.

This experience can often lead to traumatic effects on young children in particular but it can be softened by an intelligent attitude on the part of parents.

Martin Holt, director of research for Bekins Van & Storage Company, offered these hints to parents who are moving with young children:

Tell the children all about the move, where you are going, why, and when. Let them enjoy the excitement of the move by not burdening them with too many details.

Make the new move seem to be a wonderful adventure. Try to overcome the loss of friends with descriptions of the many new friends that will be made.

If possible, show them the new home before moving in and let them help make decisions on decorating their own room or arranging furniture in their play area.

Don't throw away old toys—at least not until you have reached the new home. They give a sense of security to youngsters.

Of course, try to move between school terms and encourage older children to keep up old school friendships by writing letters.

And finally, don't try to eliminate all memories of the old home. Let them be loosened gradually.
