

The Rich Worker

By I. H. McGhee
1627 W. 228th St.
They say a man is lucky
Or so the experts say They say he earns more money
That he gets greater pay
But you sit back and listen
To what I have to say
And see who gets his money
Who it is that gets his pay Now first there is his housing
An it's easy enough to find If you pay eighty dollars or more
Then you can live just fine Then there's the food his family eats
They cannot do without It takes just about twenty a week
And a lot more than that, no doubt
And then the payments on his car
It can't be less than fifty Because the dealers in autos
Are mighty smart and shifty Now the doctor, he comes in
For his league cut, and more And if you don't pay Promptly
He'll be sitting at your door
Now transportation's nothing
When you work across the street
But when you work away down town
Those gas bills you must meet
Now clothing is a must you see Both for play and working
And if you don't provide it Your duty you are shirking If you find yourself without work
And there's nothing you can do

Your creditors write you letters
And tell you they will sub-Now the federal taxes come around For twenty per cent of your money
The state tax board want their share too
And boy it is a honey Not only do they tax your food
They tax you're clothing too
The car you'er driving has a tax
And the gasoline you use Now, if you have a little dog He's your friend, and he loves you
If you want to keep him round
His taxes you pay too
Now the Union comes along
And they get their cut too
And if you do not pay your dues
There's nothing there for you
Now little incedentals Like traffic fines and such Ten dollars hear and twenty there
Of course it isn't much Whats that you say?, old friend of mine
That I'm lucky to be alive
How well I know old buddie
It costs too much to die
If you should hit it lucky Like gambling on your favorite horse
Here comes the tax collector They want their tax, of course
Oh, yes, you are so lucky
To be a working man today
You earn so much more
money
And you get so much more pay.

Decorative Plant to Grow In Dry California Climate

In a land where summer rains are few and far between, succulents will serve you well. These nearly indestructible plants suffer the worst conditions of drought without showing it, and you can't find a soil so poor they won't grow in it. Don't even look for one. Succulents come in an endless variety of sizes and shapes which have fascinated gardeners since time forgotten. Hobbyists will surround themselves with succulents, planting them to the exclusion of almost any other types of garden plants. More temperate gardeners use them to contrast with other plants and with masonry or wood textures in the landscape architecture. We have then, two big reasons for planting succulents, says the California Association of Nurserymen. On one hand, they will thrive where other plants curl up and die. On the other hand, they offer enough interest in form and color to hold their own in highly competitive garden situations—in planter boxes, in rockeries and as edgings.

one of the most useful succulents is Echeveria, or Hen and Chickens. Tucked away among rocks, or featured in a special planter, Echeveria will always catch attention. The low growing, stemless rosettes, from which tall stems push up tubular pink blooms, are familiar to all. The common name derives from the appearance of a mature blooming plant hovering over its "brood" of smaller rosettes which have pushed out from its base. You can fill a parkway with these if you have patience. Houseleek Family Vaguely familiar is the Houseleek family, which produces lowly rosettes of delicate shadings and tall flower stems of undeniable charm. Houseleek makes an excellent carpet if given time to spread out and in rockeries, or in tubs, it can be highly decorative sight. There are so many succulents, it is really a shame to single out such a few. The Euphorbia, or Spurge family, from which comes the Christmas Pointsettia, also claims several low growing succulent members of note. The Aeoniums, large and showy clumps, something like a giant Houseleek, deserve attention; and the Aloe family has several members which will interest you, or should. Perhaps the best way to meet the many we haven't mentioned, as well as those we have, is to visit a C.A.N. nurseryman and see just what he has in stock. Start with a few and you'll add to them for years to come.

Ice Plant The commonest succulent seen in California is the familiar ice plant, which covers so many dry banks in coastal areas. And if you are about to turn up your nose, have another look at what this old standby can do. We refer not to the vividly colored variety, but rather to the more subtle members of the family with longer, fleshier leaves. Use it for spot contrast in a border or rockery. Use it to cover an entire bank, or try it in a large planter box, where it will trail over the side. The brighter ice plants referred to above are too uncompromising in their color for some people, but when used as bank covers in the background, they can lend just the right amount of color. They are definitely in the no-trouble class, and you can't fault them for being so colorful.

Stonecrops Stonecrops or Sedums are more refined plants of growing interest to Californians. More and more they are being used to round out a perennial border or to hang from an overhead container. They are either upright or trailing and many of them have flowers of more than passing beauty and interest. One of the best Sedums is Showy Sedums with round, blue-green leaves and clusters of pink flowers topping each sturdy stem. It's an all round good choice for general garden use or for special attention. A long time favorite and

Petition Request County Annex Carson Tract

Supervisor Kenneth Hahn said a petition is now being circulated requesting the county board of supervisors to annex two adjacent subdivision tracts in the Carson area to the Delores Lighting District. The tracts include Dolores St. north of 213th St., 211th St., Clarion Drive, Catskill Ave., and Marbella Ave. If the board approves the annexation after a review of the petition and a public hearing, Hahn said, 12 new lights will be installed on new steel poles and five more on existing wood poles by the Southern California Edison Co. Hahn said interested citizens could get in touch with W. R. Fuller of 21222 Cat-skill Ave., Torrance, who is handling the petitions.
