Sewing Circles

By BECKY SCHAEFFER

It's almost woolies weather again! And this year, the wool is really wooly.

Skirts are bulky, coats are heavy. Lines are straight and so that the uncluttered so that the bulk will wear well.

Are you one of the many people who look at a good piece of wool and have terrors of cutting into it? An average quality wool will cost about four or five dollars a yard, and be from 52 to 60 inches wide.

Some nylon blends will cost a dollar or so less (and the quality is excellent!) and some suiting-weight blends will be only 45 inches wide. While wool is costly by the yard, it should be remembered that a yard and a half will often make a dress, two yards a suit, depending on size and style.

One of my pet suits is wool-nylon blend, the other 100 percent imported wool. They are variations of the same pattern, — a box jacket with short sleeves, with or without collar. I always cover the buttons, but bound buttonholes are not always called for.

If you want a bound buttonhole in woollens that are very heavy, a scrap of cotton knit material in the same shade is extremely attractive, for the part of the buttonhole that shows. The heavy wool itself simply will not make a neat buttonhole.

One good method of making bound buttonholes in bulky material is to use two scraps of material. Make the same, rectangle on the facing that you do on the jacket front. But on the facing, just poke the material through the hole, flatten out and tack down.

Whip down on the facing side just as you would with the usual method. The 2x3" piece of material should be very lightweight, but firm and strong. A piece of cotton or wool knit may be made firmer by the addition of a piece of iron-on interfacing.

Seams in wool have to have special treatment in most cases. Those of us who have zig-zag machine or attachment bless them daily for the ease with which they bind seams. In very loosely woven wool, I recommend that, with a large stitch, you sew just at the edge of your material to avoid stretching while you are zig-zagging the edge.

This will help avoid raveling, too. Of course the very professional way is still to bind the seams. With bias strips made of your lining material or with seam binding tape in a matching color, try using your seam binder.

If you haven't used it before, and don't know how, drop into the store where you bought your machine (or the local store of that company) and ask for a demonstration of that particular attachment. It can be a life saver, and will give your seams a wonderfully professional look.

If you plan to bind seams after the garment is made, be very sure to add to your seam allowance. The proper time to bind seams is after the garment has been pinned and fitted but before seams are in. Binding 5/8" seam after it is sewn is nearly impossible.

To prepare your machine for sewing on wool, follow these rules: be sure machine is clean and oiled. Release pressure on sewing foot (the screw for this is on top of your machine on the left side).

Set your stitch regulator at eight or ten stitches per inch, and loosen your tension slightly. Be sure to test on a doubled strip of material. Take your test piece and open it, pulling on the seam.

If the seam is pinched very tight, lengthen your stitch. If too loose, shorten it.
