DOROTHY DIGS
in the garden

Red Spider Mites are now in evidence on many shrubs, trees and garden plants. Home gardeners find red spider particularly hard to get rid of, probably because they are not readily seen without the use of a microscope. The damage occurs rapidly and usually is confined to closely grouped areas of foliage. When the infestation is first noticed leaves begin to turn brown in color and seem to appear lifeless. Usually, on garden vegetables such as green beans, the damage is not serious until the lower leaves are completely infested. Then the entire plant starts to suffer from the continuous sucking action of the spider mite.

Detection can sometimes be made by rubbing the underside of the leaves with the thumb. This smashes a great many of them and discolors thumb, showing the presence of spider mite. Many colonies are hatched on each leaf and spread rapidly to nearby plants.

One way to rid the plants of these pests is to use a product containing kelthane. Re-infestations are common and later spraying may be necessary. With the advent of cold weather the spider mite is no longer a problem.

FIRST AID TIP

First aid care for burns has as its chief objectives treatment for shock, relief of pain and prevention of contamination, according to the Red Cross, which has been teaching first aid for 50 years. Shock is a major hazard, serious commonly when the burn involves more than 10 per cent of the body's surface and sometimes when the area is smaller. The patient with a serious burn should be transported without delay to a hospital. Exclusion of air from a burn by application of a thick dressing relieves pain and if the dressing is sterile prevents further contamination. Do not apply ointments to the burned surface.
