COUNT MARCO SAYS

Give Her a Course in Fashions

American teen-age girls seem to be more preoccupied with comic magazines and comic characters such as the Beatles than with proper subjects such as correct fashion habits.

No wonder so many grow up to think basic black and pearls is an acceptable mode of dress when it really isn't.

But, as always, I come to you with a workable solution to improve not only your mind but your figure.

Every school should have a fashion course. Not only should this course be designed for girls, but the boys should be command-ed to attend, too.

Each student will have to sub-scribe to at least one American fashion magazine of note, such as Vogue, and one European fashion magazine, such as Elle, from France.

knows what she's talking about, instead of some old dragon who hides her homeliness under a basic black uniform, should conduct the course.

This course is not to be a hap-hazard, hit-ormiss sort of thing like all those unnecessary home economics things, wherein the only thing girls learn is how to make terrible coffee to klatch over, but should instead have a realistic approach to fashion.

Current styles should be analyzed carefully, with open discussions between the boys and girls. Trips should be made to factories to learn what goes into making clothes; designers should be called in to tell why they detail dresses the way they do. Even saleswomen should be called in to lecture on selling techniques.

Boys should analyze what the girls are wearing and give their candid opinions, not only about dresses but on hair styles, shoes, dresses but on nair styles, shoes, make-up, etc.

With this kind of training the girls will go into life with complete confidence that they have some knowledge of a most important facet of everyday living.

Boys, too, will learn what makes women well groomed and outstanding, as contrasted with the little high school chippies who manage to trap them into being reluctant fathers too soon because they mistook all that overdone gook for fashion.

Even more important, with such knowledge the American male will shine in a field where until now he has been a miserable failure: knowing when and how to give a compliment.

From some of the bad dress habits I've seen, very few American women deserve any sort of compliment. But my course will change all that.

change all that.
