Home from Year in Scotland

Exchange Teacher Gives Views

Scotland was fine, but there's no place like home.

That was the observation of Miss Mary Barrett, Torrance teacher who returned home this month from Edinburgh, Scotland, where she served a year as an exchange teacher at St. Ignatius and St. Davids schools.

Under the exchange teacher program, Miss Mae Apolinaire came from Edinburgh to take over Miss Barrett's fourth grade class at Victor Elementary School, Torrance.

"Children are the same anywhere," declared Miss Barrett, "but what they do with their potential depends so much on the home and school environment."

Miss Barrett will be glad to return to Victor School this fall, after serving in an Edinburgh school that was built in 1872. Scheduled to be demolished in a pending slum-clearance project, St. Ignatius School was a three-story building boasting a window-wall in each room, but no bulletin boards or stationary blackboards. Teachers wrote on portable chalkboards and if they wished to display materials, taped the pictures to the walls. St. Davids, where she served after Easter vacation when classes were reshuffled because of dwindling enrollment, was a more modern school, she stated.

Because classrooms were small, room activity at St. Ignatius was confined to sitting at individual desks except for twice-a-day recess, when the students filed down to the end of a street which had been roped off and played street games. "Equipment varies from school to school," Miss Barrett stated. At St. Davids there were big playgrounds with large grassy stretches and blacktop play areas.

"What I was most homesick for," the dark-haired teacher confides, "was the Educational Materials Building. We didn't have the equipment, supplies or audio-visual aids we have here. At the two schools where I taught there were no record players or movie projectors. There was a limited supply of books at each school. A teacher didn't have the choice she has here."

Change is going on in education constantly in Scotland, Miss Barrett commented. Many of the principals are trying out new ideas. But with so much new in the field to catch up with, teachers are feeling their way slowly.

One of the differences in teaching in Scotland was the fact that there was far less communication, according to Miss Barrett. "A teacher never got to meet a parent.

There were no conferences, no open house, no PTA," she said. "If I wanted to talk to a mother, my only chance was to see if I could run into her when she came to pick up her child after school. Faculty communication was also slight. Instead of weekly faculty meetings, the principal only talked to his teachers officially three times during the year, and one of those occasions was a tea and another a paper-correcting session."

Lunch hour was an interesting experience, she commented. Instead of food being prepared in school cafeterias and students filing in line to be served, catering trucks delivered meals from a central kitchen which served several schools. Students sat down to an hour-and-twenty minute meal. The older girls served as waitresses. After the youngsters had polished off their main course, the upperclass girls cleared their plates and brought dessert.

Teachers and townspeople were friendly. Although gasoline and cigarettes were expensive, Miss Barrett found an evening at the theatre or a concert a fairly inexpensive treat. During the Christmas holidays she went skiing in the Alps. She visited the Netherlands when the tulips were in bloom and spent Easter in Ireland. Throughout the year she travelled extensively in Scotland and England. She particularly enjoyed looking up old friends she had met while serving as an exchange teacher in Canada nine years ago, several of whom were from the British Isles. In addition, she had reunions with teachers she had met while on sabbatical leave four years ago and during a trip abroad the summer of 1957.

How would she sum up her experience as an exchange teacher in Scotland? "It was a good experience. I met a lot of nice people. It helped me appreciate a lot of things I've been taking for granted in our schools. I think every teacher would profit by a year of exchange. He or she would have to be very adaptable to accept things as they are—not set out to change anything. But he'd find it worth his while."
