SORTING PEGS . . . Peggy Raesch, a student at Columbia School, sorts pegs during a part of the training program at Columbia School. The program is geared toward helping students differentiate sizes and shapes in preparation for assembly line duties at PAR Workshop after graduation. Emphasis is on developing finger dexterity.

graduation from Columbia meant obscurity, when the 18-year-old no longer eligible for schooling had no place to go. Unemployable, he vegetated at home or became institutionalized.

For the past year, however, since the opening of one of Los Angeles County's three PAR workshops in the area, Columbia students have looked to the future.

To prepare his students to acquire skills needed to perform jobs at PAR Workshop, Lester Foster, principal at Columbia, has set up a training program at the Torrance school.

In a shop class geared at developing finger dexterity as well as ability to differentiate, he has set up tables of colored bins. Each bin is marked as to what is to go into it — perhaps lengths of aluminum tubing, or sections of plastic hose, or assorted screws and bolts.

Boxes of materials are put on each table and students are asked to sort the materials into their proper bin. They progress from simple tasks, such as sorting colored tongue depressors, to more complicated ones, such as separating different sized nails.

After they sort the articles they must put a certain number of objects in a box, a certain number of boxes in a case, and must put away a certain number of cases.

If they have difficulty sealing or tying a package of eight to ten boxes, they are given special exercises in their physical education class to strengthen the finger muscles.

"For our students, this is pre-vocational training," Foster says. "If they can develop the coordination and finger dexterity, they may be able to look forward to a future in the sheltered workshop. Instead of being the end of the road, graduation can mean going to work every day, buying their snack from a catering truck during coffee break, and getting the cash for the work they've performed at the end of every week."

Torrance Unified School District will be represented at a conference on "Improving Personnel Practices" at the University of Southern California, Los Angeles, Nov. 2 and 3, by William B. Forest, Dr. James G. Sibert, Dr. Robert C. Morton, and Dr. Robert R. Ford.

Lomita Council Slates Hearing on Zone Case

Lomita City Councilmen will hold a public hearing on a proposal to rezone 54.6 acres near Western Avenue and West Palos Verdes Drive North when they convene tomorrow for a special meeting at 7 p.m.

The property, which has been the subject of several hearings, has been recommended for rezoning to R-1-7,500 (single family homes with 7,500 square-foot lots), R-1-7,000, and CPD-10,000 (Commercial planned development) by the Lomita Planning Commission.

The rezoning has been sought by American Savings and Loan Association. It was refused earlier, but new hearings were ordered when a request for apartment zoning was eliminated in favor of larger lots and a commercial area.

In a resolution recommending the zone change, the commission said the proposed residential development would be "compatible with adjacent existing developments" and noted a "need for additional commercial facilities at the location."

Commercial facilities, developed under provisions of the CPD zone "will not be detrimental to surrounding properties," the commission said.
